Not Perfect Enough

Something strange happens when people find out their “normal” friends are dedicated disciples. They begin to see them differently. Often, they no longer seem approachable. They are aloof, “holier-than-thou.”

Why does this happen? Religious people often carry the unsustainable stereotype of being morally incorruptible and “perfect.” But as we know, nothing could be further from the truth. Disciples are weak, susceptible to corruption, and doomed to fail.

Take a look at Jesus’ disciples; when Jesus needed them most, they all abandoned Him, just as He said they would.

So where does the world develop this perfection stereotype? The same place every stereotype develops: ignorance. People truly don’t know what it means to be Jesus’ disciple, so they take what they see from television and archetypes of religious people and attach those perceptions onto true disciples.

This may seem unfair, but it’s actually quite encouraging. Why? Because we have a chance to show them that being a disciple doesn’t demand perfection from us.

True discipleship demands a life dedicated to the One who was perfect.
